William Morris, and others like him, didn't approve of the mass-produced art that was the result of the industrialised Victorian society. The Arts and Crafts movement, which he founded, favoured a return to skilled workmanship and high quality goods instead of machine-made items.

In 1861, William Morris set up his own company along with a few other artists. They produced furniture, wallpaper, textiles (such as cushions and curtains) and jewellery. The Arts and Crafts movement became very popular, although it was mainly the middle and upper classes who could afford the hand-made pieces.
